UNCLE SAM'S RHYMES

Plenty of Oil.

Within our mountain clime today, Down deep into the ground, Where sunlight ne'er can cast a ray, There's lots of oil abound.

'Tis here and there, 'tis everywhere, And men of skill and toil Have leased our land both far and near, And drilling now for oil.

'Tis coming stronger every day, Say, wouldn't it be a charm, To give to these prospector men leace on every farm. and when the papers have been signed, The farmer's hour of toil

Shall vanish like a summer dream,

When they have struck the oil. Some farmers now have reached the mark, And nearing life's brief span, And late and early they have worked

As hard as any man. Misfortune came to some of them Their castles all did spoil. But better days are shining bright,

For they have struck the oil. We will not stop it; let it come,

Come scooting on the way, The drills are boring here and there, Which suits us all O. K. Twill give the town the higgest boost, Iwould be the proper snap, To see our little old Hazel Green A big bunch on the map.

And business, too, will torge ahead, In one tremendous sweep, Then wealth would roll in day by day, And night while we're asleep, We'll catch it floating round on wings, And there'll be no recoil,

The world will be ours sure enough When ev'rything beams with oil. UNCLE SAM.

By P. N. Moore, State Geological Survey, And Reproduced From the Files of The Herald of 1885.

The limestone, so pure in quality and so persistent in position, which often serve as near the Ohio river, seem to be entirely almost no value whatever for use in geo logical identification.

The absence of these limestones, and the frequency with which the sandstones and struction of an accurate section, and the dentification of coal seams across any great interval, a matter of considerable difficulty. as well as the character of the prevailing portion of the boats never reaching their lence throughout this region, during its coal, at the marke's along the lower river deposion, of shallow waters much disturbed so great that Pennsylvania coal is brought for aid.
